Ethics and Opioids

About the Program
The ethics and opioids talks will identify and analyze frequent professional and popular beliefs about human nature and the personal and societal factors that influence a client's direction in life. Based on that analysis we will discuss the characteristics of an ethical and effective practitioner and the ethical dilemmas they often face. We will then explore ethical behavior in a therapeutic relationship and apply those concepts to case scenarios with course participants' direct involvement.

Who Should Attend?
Physicians, nurses, counselors, psychologists, social workers, law enforcement, mental health professionals, parents, and any other individuals involved in the assessment, treatment, ethical considerations, and rehabilitation efforts of clients/patients as well as those confronting the crisis of opioid use and addiction.

Objectives
Give reasons in support of the view that forward-looking moral responsibility for caring for victims of the opioid crisis is shared among physicians, nurses, mental health professionals, social workers, community members, government, and family.
Provide an encounter in which the learner evaluates, defines, and establishes a personal belief about their own professional values as they learn and apply the fundamental principles of professional ethical behaviors.
