Course Description
Parkinson’s disease (PD) is a neurodegenerative disease affecting approximately 1% of the population. It most famously causes movement problems including slowness, stiffness, rest tremor and balance problems. However, Parkinson’s disease and its treatments can also cause a myriad of non-motor problems including gastrointestinal dysmotility, orthostatic hypotension, diplopia, urinary incontinence, sexual dysfunction, dementia, hallucinations and sleep disorders. These features can be as or more disabling than the motor features, and management of these symptoms is vital in order to maximize a patient’s quality of life. Because of the wide ranging symptoms that can be associated with Parkinson’s disease, physicians in a variety of disciplines see these patients and need guidance on therapeutic strategies. This CME course will address the non-motor features associated with Parkinson’s Disease and its treatments. Each section of the course will be team-taught by a faculty member in the Movement Disorders division along with a faculty member with expertise in the symptom under discussion. Each section will present a comprehensive overview of the problems that can arise and suggest treatment options.

Target Audience
General neurologists, geriatricians, internists, psychiatrists, urologists, gastroenterologists and cardiologists who take care of patients with Parkinson’s disease.

Educational Objectives
At the conclusion of this activity, participants should be able to:
- Screen Parkinson’s patients for non-motor symptoms
- Treat non-motor symptoms in Parkinson’s patients more effectively.
- Screen patients for non-motor complications of Parkinson’s disease treatment
- Offer strategies to help non-motor symptoms caused by Parkinson’s disease treatments
